Information about the project

Title of the study:

The Oblivion of the Anglian Era in Modern Yorkshire: Data Gathering for a Network Grant

Description: This research project examines perceptions and representations of the Roman, Anglian, and Viking past, chiefly in York, but also farther afield in the Northeast. The goal is to explore the apparent neglect, in York itself, of the Anglian past as opposed to the city's the Viking and Roman histories. An IPUP intern will be collecting data about the presentation of the local past, highlighting contrasts that emerge between the relative emphasis on Romans, Anglians and Scandinavians, in York and other selected locations in the Northeast. The outcome of the project will be a substantial report by the intern, to be used as the basis for a networking grant that will support collaborations to reflect on, and find ways to promote, greater public engagement with a neglected and illustrious era of York's past.

Researcher: Dr Mary Garrison of the University of York's History Department is the project leader. The researcher is Ryan Daly, an MA student in Medieval History and IPUP intern.

Methods: Twenty minute recorded interviews

Confidentiality and anonymity: A report on salient points from the interviews will form one part of the written report. Interviewees may grant permission for the recording of their interview to be saved. Interviewees may opt to be anonymous, to be identified generically by their job, or to be mentioned by name. They may withdraw from the interview and withdraw their consent at any stage.

Nothing will be used in the report without the consent of the interviews. The interview section of the report will never be made public or quoted without permission of the interviewees.

Results of the study: An illustrated report on site visits, tourist guides, social media and interviews. Interviewees will be offered an electronic copy of the interview section of the report, or the full report if they wish.
